

I am firmly for the FCC maintaining Title II regulations for Internet Service Providers and for keeping a truly neutral internet. While less regulation may work for a physical marketplace I cannot help but believe that if ISPs are less regulated they can and will begin to show favoritism via the throttling of data or forcing people or businesses to pay premiums to enjoy a 'fast lane.' Our highways and interstates are used equally to any and all people or businesses without toll booths so too should people and businesses have the freedom to use the information superhighway with the highest quality speeds that can be provided without paying extra fees to do so.

I realize this example may not be the best but I'm afraid I am not articulate enough to express my wishes in clearer terms. I hope this is sufficient enough to make my point clear. Which to reiterate is- The FCC should keep the Title II Net Neutrality Rules set back in February of 2015.
